Why Our Work Matters

The Rohingya refugee community continues to experience uncertainty, limited educational opportunities, restricted livelihoods, and protection challenges. Young people represent a large proportion of the refugee population, yet they often have limited opportunities to develop their skills or participate in community leadership.

RYLN believes that investing in refugee youth creates long-term benefits for the entire community. When young people gain knowledge, confidence, and leadership skills, they become role models, educators, volunteers, and advocates who help build stronger and more resilient communities.

Our Approach

Our work is community-led and inclusive. We actively involve women and girls, persons with disabilities, community leaders, volunteers, and young people in planning and implementing activities. We prioritize accountability, transparency, safeguarding, and respect for human dignity in every project we undertake.
